For over a half a century, beloved American artist, Norman Rockwell, painted a chronicle of life in the United States. Today the appeal of his art endures because he was a master at capturing on canvas the humor and humanity of ordinary people engaged in everyday living. Among Rockwell's best and most memorable works are his "Four Seasons" illustration. He produced these during his later years, as a commissioned artist for Brown Bigelow, America's leading manufacturer of calendar advertising. Brown and Bigelow continues to hold exclusive rights to reproductions of these originally commissioned works. Each of the "Four Seasons" series tell a story and follows its characters through a complete year of changing seasons. Each of the character through a complete year of changing seasons. Each of the characters is drawn from the artist's real life family and friends. It is these real people lovingly portrayed against a backdrop of passing time, that makes the subjects so emotionally engaging to the viewer. In the series pictured here, "Four Ages of Love", Rockwell has captured the shy affection of two young people who are surrounded by their friends of the animal kingdom to the courting of the young couple followed by their fond remembrances of middle age culminating in the happy sharing of their golden years. The timeless appeal of his images make them extremely applicable to the development of a broad array of creative and successful products because people all over the world have come to enjoy and see their own humanity reflected in the work of America's foremost illustrator.
